Local News Update

It has been almost six months since Bali in lockdown and travel were prohibited, and the island returned to its former village state without the economy running through its vein. Many went out of business while some are striving to survive for the next month. Seeing as this cannot go on further, the government reopened the local tourism last month.

It was not easy to get here. Travellers must have a written letter that they have been tested and are permitted to travel with safety measures. Masks became a must-have in your daily life. Portable sinks are everywhere, and every entry in the island feels like going to a checkpoint.

But, that did not discourage travellers from coming. As people cooped up in their homes, they put Bali as the bucket list once the quarantine is gone. And not just travellers, business owners want their source of income to come again. With people are hurdling towards Bali, many businesses gave out discounts or inexpensive staycation in their hotels and villas. These ideas are applied to marine tourism as well. Dinner offers and group packages are surging on the net, while day trips depend on the target destination.

These efforts are to rebuild the economy step-by-step until the world is allowed to visit this magnificent island. For now, local travellers and expatriates are welcome to savour the long-awaited holiday in Bali.

Indonesia is still evaluating when to reopen Bali and other tourist hot spots i.e : Labuan Bajo, Raja Ampat to foreign visitors, noting that efforts to curb the spread of coronavirus has higher priority than the economy.
